Provenance:

Cells in Stream was created for a specific series of photopolymer etchings created by the British landscape artist Adrian Hemming (b. 1945). The work from this period, particularly around 2000, is noted for its 'transmutation' of natural subjects into semi-hallucinatory, super-enhanced images through the use of photopolymer etching techniques. The series is notably held by Deutsche Bank and British Airways. The British Museum and V & A Museum retain Hemming's works of art in their permanent collections. Hemming is also a frequent contributor to the Royal Academy, London Summer Exhibitions.
